What is C-me?

C-me lets staff from education, health and social work, share important information about young people on their computers at work. The point of information sharing is to get help to young people that need it.

What information does C-me show?

C-me shows information such as name, address, date of birth, health centre and school.

C-me also shows the names and contact details of the main staff in schools, health and social work who are working with young people.

If there are any worries about a young person's safety, this will show too.

Who uses C-me?

School staff, doctors, nurses, counsellors and social workers use C-me. The police sometimes use it, but only when they are worried about someone's safety.

Can I see information about myself?

Yes, the law says you can see any information that is kept about you. Ask for help from any of the C-me users, that you know. They'll help you to see information about yourself.

What if there are mistakes?

You can get mistakes put right and your comments can be noted.

What if I don't want my information to be shared?

You might be able to stop information being shared.

It depends ...

- If there's any worry about your safety, the law says that workers have to share information to protect you.
- If you don't want your information shared, speak to your parent, carer or anyone working with you such as a teacher, doctor, counsellor or social worker.

This leaflet is a brief guide to C-me.
